WHAT WE DO

“I just don’t want to feel this alone anymore.”

At 74, Margaret found herself struggling more each day. Three years after losing her husband, grief and loneliness had settled heavily around her small Calgary apartment. With no close family nearby, she began relying on alcohol just to get through evenings that felt unbearably quiet. What started as a coping mechanism slowly became a daily dependence that affected her sleep, her health, and her confidence.

As her mobility declined and her income remained fixed, even leaving home became a challenge. She began canceling appointments and withdrawing from the world around her, too embarrassed to ask for help. Growing concerned, her family doctor referred her to the Mental Health and Addiction Response Team, recognizing that Margaret needed support she could no longer reach on her own.

Everything began to change when the Outreach Team met Margaret where she felt safest, at home. Sitting with her in her own living room eased her anxiety enough to share the full story of her grief, depression, and increasing alcohol use. Together, they created a personalized plan focused on safety, emotional stabilization, and compassionate, non-judgmental help.

Over time, the team wrapped a circle of support around her. They coordinated with her doctor, connected her with essential resources, and arranged transportation so she could attend appointments again. To ease her isolation, they encouraged her to join a local seniors’ group and a weekly coffee meetup. Slowly, Margaret began forming new connections and rediscovering a sense of belonging she feared she had lost forever.

Months later, Margaret’s progress is remarkable. She has reduced her alcohol use, sleeps better, attends counselling regularly, and participates actively in community activities. Most importantly, she shares that she feels “hopeful for the first time in years.” Her journey is a powerful reminder of what timely outreach, compassion, and meaningful connection can make possible. One life, one home visit, one renewed sense of hope at a time.
